"HER PROPER STATION."

Beautiful Edith Merrion | Fair as a flower or a star; exquisite as a picture or a statue, or any other perfect and lovely thing to which it is the fashion to compare youth and grace and exceeding beauty-sue looked, in her neat, plain, dark cashmere dress, sister-in-law, the haughty, wealthy widow tall and lovely but sorrowful-looking girl of his elder brother James, looked at him was Mrs. Gray's daughter—Mrs. Davis; made no scruples about saying so, too. His in amazement and contempt.

"I am surprised at you, Paul. A mere nobody. My companion-nursery governess for Elise-seamstress-what you will! I do beg that you will not make such absurd remarks in the girl's hearing. You will fill her head with nonsensical ideas, and quite unfit her for her proper station." Paul answered her contemptuous tones with an angry sneer.

"Perhaps our ideas of her 'station' differ, you see. Her father, although poor, is a gentleman. A clergyman upon a small salary, but in good repute, is the equal at least of your father, who made a fortune out of pork. But you may rest assured that when I make her discontented with quietly, indeed. No merriment to jar upon her position here I shall be prepared to offer her a better one."

"That of your wife, perhaps?" very contemptuously. "Precisely. Before many weeks-perhaps days-are over I hope to offer her my hand.

A business opportunity has suddenly presented itself which seems likely to secure to me prosperity. That is what calls me away so suddenly to-night. If I succeed-and, indeed, whether or no-I shall ask Edith to become my wife."

"And you make quite sure of being accepted. You are right there; it is what this shameless ingrate has been plotting for ever since she came into the house-to secure a husband superior to her in station and foist Paul had said, "Only for a week, darling," herself upon his family. Oh, I am not sur-prised! I've seen her lures and arts and wiles; the artful, designing adventuress. I've seen-"

And there she stopped suddenly, confused, if not ashamed, for the door of an adjoining room was flung open, and Edith Merrion stood before her trembling and " passion-pale."

"You had forgotten that I was within bearing, madam," she said, with indignant "You know that you accuse me falsely. I am innocent of all effort to attract your brother's attention or win from more to give you. Poor as I am, I am at least too proud to 'foist myself' upon a family where no welcome awaits me; and

It was her turn to stop suddenly now, startled at the lady's absence. No sooner had she turned to address Paul Selden than his sister-in-law, embarrassed and angry, had swept noiselessly from the room. Edith's pale cheeks grew crimson. She gave one quick glance at the door, as if she ulso contemplated a retreat; but Paul caught her little hands in both his own and detained her.

tude, Edith," he said earnestly. "I want your beart and this fair hand. Ob. love, have I deceived myself when I hoped the treasure of your affection might be mine? That you would be my wife?"

But the woman to whom he spoke was had stung her bitterly. Hurt pride and was kindness itself to the poor girl, and very proud. Mrs. Selden's unjust words wounded modesty were all in arms, and for one passionate moment stifled love. "It is as she said; he has made quite sure of being accepted!" she thought bitterly, and snatched her hand away. "It is impossible-impossible!" she cried; "your sister is right. Seek your wife from a higher station, sir; for me-it is But Paul persisted. A man does not give up the hope of his life and the desire of his heart very easily.

"Leave my sister out of the question. I marry to please myself-not her. Only let me hope that you love me, and nothing shall ever make me give you up. Ob, Edith, do you care for me? Will you let your pride break both our hearts?"

Ah, no. she could not! Something in the well-loved, pleading tones struck at her heart. She looked into the tender, kind, reproachful eyes, and then-all at once she was in his arms, and wept forth all her grief upon his bosom.

The next minute the sound of an approaching footstep startled her. It was Mrs. Selden coming back. "I must go," she whispered. "Good-

And then she had lifted ber tear-wet, blushing face, received on it her lover's first fond kiss, heard his quick whisper, "For a week only, darling!" and tore herself from his clasping arms and fled away to her own chamber. Thither came Mrs. Selden to her, some two hours later, when Paul had safely de-

"You anticipate what I am about to say, no doubt," she began coldly. "I desire that you prepare instantly to leave my house. Here is the money due you, and also another month's wages in advance. A carriage will come for your trunks in an hour, and the sooner you leave the better."
"I think so. too," answered Edith, with hauteur scarcely inferior to her own. "I will take the money due to me, madam, but no more, and in an hour I will relieve you of my presence."

So it came to pass that when Paul Selden's week of probation was ended, and he came back successful and joyous to claim his bride, he found a bitter disappointment awaiting him-the bonny bird had flown. No information concerning her could be oblained from Mrs. Selden. "I know absolutely nothing of her move ments," said she, coldly, "and if I did I should decline to aid you in disgracing sently. "Mrs. Davis that was, Miss Mer-

"He cannot come to me, for he does not know where 1 am," she said to herself, "and if I shou'd send my address to Mrs Selden's house she would surely suppress it. But I can walk in the neighborhood occasionally and meet him as he goes in or out. We love each other-I am to be his wife-surely there can be no impropriety in my trying to meet him."

And she did try-almost as faithfully as she tried to obtain fresh employment, and as unsuccessfully.

One afternoon, passing near Mrs. Selden's house, on her return from a disheartening interest in the phenomenon, and agreed inquiry after a position, she met little Elise | that the patient was suffering from a conand her nurse, and from them learned that cussion of the auditory nerve caused by the Paul had paid a very brief visit and gone thunder-bolt. "Then go at once, my dear. The cab that was to have taken my daughter is at the door-put your things together and go. It may be that Mrs. Sinclair will think you too young, but she'll take you for the present, at least, until Mrs. Davis can come to her. You tell her I sent you and you'll see." So Edith, feeling like one in a dream, drove to the address that had been given her, and asking for Mrs. Sinclair, sent up

So, at least, thought Paul Selden, and word that her new housekeeper was below. Of course Mrs. Sinclair concluded that the moreover, she being exceedingly deaf, Edith found it almost impossible to make her understand the contrary.

"You're young indeed to be a widow and the mother of a four-year-old child," said she. "God belp us! What trouble some people do bave to endure, to be sure! Well, well, you'll have a comfortable home with me, if you suit me, my dear, and I have no doubt that you will."

"My name is Merrion." began Edith, somewhat more loudly. The old lady put up her wrinkled band, and smiled and shook her head. "A merry one!" said she. " No, no, my dear; have no fear of that. I live very your feelings here, but quiet and comfortable enough." So, then, Edith, weary and faint for lack of food, and sick at heart, resolved to let the mistake go at present; there would be plenty of time to rectify it afterward. "After I have taken Mrs. Davis's place I will take her name as well," she thought. It will only be until the child gets well, most probably.
